(AP) — Officials in Wyoming have been asked to step down for what critics say is a slap in the face of the victims of the state's worst nuclear disaster. A legislative panel in the state's far-flung southeastern corner scheduled a special legislative session Wednesday to address the resignations of three top officials in the aftermath of the Dec. 29 meltdown at a uranium mill near the town of Arlen. Duke Energy and the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission fault the quick action of state emergency officials in halting production and pulling the plant offline to prevent a catastrophic explosion. But critics say the state's emergency teams were not fit to manage a major disaster. "It's the arrogance and the arrogance only comes from the top," said state Rep. Rachel Noble, R-Hinckley, a former emergency operations official herself. The company who owns the Fort Smith Generating Station has hired a law firm to investigate whether state emergency officials violated their contracts by sacking four department heads, Noble said. The agency heads, who were told to submit their resignation letters Tuesday, have not commented. Noble said she also has hired an attorney to explore potential criminal charges against the

Gulf Science Academy In the US, the term "pre-service teacher" refers to a teacher or administrator that recently completed a pre-service program in teaching. In Canada and the US, pre-service teachers may also refer to a teacher or administrator who is in the initial stages of attending a teacher education program to complete a teacher education degree (such as an advanced diploma, Bachelor of Education). In Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the United Kingdom and other countries, the term refers to a teacher who is in the first stage of the teacher education process. In Canada, the term is sometimes used to refer to any teacher, regardless of professional qualification or teaching experience. Pre-service teachers (with or without professional teaching qualification) in the US tend to be recent college graduates with Bachelor's degrees, after which time they go to school for an additional two years or more. These teachers often hold master's degrees in subjects like science, mathematics and education. In Australia, teacher education in some areas now involves a teacher residency that lasts two to three years before a teacher graduates. In New Zealand, teacher education is a residency model, and teachers live in a teacher-education institution for their entire tenure. In the UK, a teaching qualification in any subject is preceded by a pre-service teacher education, which varies from teacher to teacher and also from school to school. The UK National College for Teaching and Leadership (NCTL) has a policy of requiring a two-year residential pre-service teaching program, followed by a two-year taught degree course for which a PGCE may be required. In the US, teachers may study towards an Elementary Education, Middle, High or Secondary Education degree, depending on their own career plans and the courses available. Some states require teachers to complete a two-year pre-service teacher education (PSTE), where teacher education students are taught and supervised by a staff of professional educators. They must then complete the education degree, which is usually pursued simultaneously with a Master's degree. Many states require that teachers be certified, usually through a state-approved program of professional development. In some states, the "secretary of education" determines a teacher's eligibility and the state determines the certification. Teachers usually prepare for certification through their current school district, as these states have mentored pre-service programs. All teachers may then apply for and be granted state certification, which is usually monitored by a state-based board. Certification may be required for
